

Feijoa Cocktail Bar

Written by Cecily Layzell

Monday, 08 March 2010 19:32 - Last Updated Sunday, 26 February 2012 13:08

Owned by Sergej Fokke, an ex-Dutch Royal Marine, and named after a New Zealand fruit, Feijoa (pronounced 'fe-joy-a') is a small cocktail bar just around the corner from Amsterdam's Rembrandtplein.

Seating is at the bar or on white leather sofas, which are starting to look rather tatty. One wall is covered with mirrors and the tall shelves behind the bar are filled with gleaming bottles. The place attracts a relatively upmarket local crowd, although the occasional tourist does stumble across it.

Like Feijoa itself, the selection of cocktails is small, but the focus is definitely on quality rather than quantity. Alongside classic cocktails, the bar staff is happy to mix up some more unusual concoctions such as the summery gin infused with cucumber and rose petals, mixed with pink grapefruit juice and served with a stick of rhubarb. Beer is also served if hops are more your thing.

Service is generally friendly and the bar staff knowledgeable, but it can get very crowded at weekends when service tends to go downhill.

Get a very cool 360-degree panorama of Feijoa cocktail bar here .